114 workers lose jobs at coal mine

Canyon Fuel's Dugout Canyon mine near Wellington eliminated 114 jobs in what its parent company called a "market driven" response to weak regional demand for coal.

Arch Coal, Inc., the owner of Canyon Fuel also indicated it intends to suspend longwall operations when it completes work on the current panel sometime during the first half of 2012.

The company stressed that the decision was no fault of the miners. "We regret the need to take this difficult action," said Paul A. Lang, executive vice president of operations, in a prepared statement. "We want to thank the hardworking employees at Dugout Canyon for their dedication and their strong commitment to running a safe and productive operation. We hope to retain most, if not all, of these valued members of the Canyon Fuel team - and plan to offer positions to the affected employees at operations within Arch's national network of mines."

Employees who fill open positions in other states will be given relocation assistance. The company will pay the employees who cannot relocate 60 days of wages and benefits as well as a severance package.
